A ten-store factory building without adequate means of escape in case of fire is a little different from a ten-story apartment building, and yet you will find thousands of them in our large cities. If there was a law forbidding the erection of buildings of more than six stories unless there were ample exits there would be fewer terrible disasters like the one which recently occurred in New York (one trouble is the lack of fire escapes). Sometimes they "obey" the law, but they "forget" to "obey" themselves stiff when a poor man is putting up a house, but when a millionaire builds a great big apartment or a factory, he is sure to get a story building.
